In Collaboration With:

Water supply and sanitation in Israel are intricately linked to the historical development of Israel. Because rain falls only in the winter, and largely in the northern part of the country, irrigation and water engineering are considered vital to the country's economic survival and growth. In Israel, there are over a hundred innovative water technology start-ups in various stages of development, working to accelerate water technologies in order to provide fresh water to future generations.

In an average year, Israel relies for about half of its water supply on unconventional water resources, including reclaimed water and desalination. Access to safe water has a tremendous impact on the world.

Drip irrigation, desalination and the concept of reusable water all had their roots in Israel and are now helping countries around the world cope with desertification and shortage of Water. Get a glimpse of some of the latest Israeli water technologies, providing solutions to the challenges of water scarcity, as presented at the WATEC Exhibition.
